I am not surprised by last night. I'm surprised Republicans thought they could blindly back Trump for two years, offer almost no pushback (when it was needed most), and somehow expect a different outcome.

You cannot promise lower prices, push heavy tariffs, drag out a war, dismiss corruption, and repeatedly tell Americans how rich this country is while we're all going broke feeding that machine.

The border? Fine. I'll give Trump that. But what else has made a real difference in our everyday lives?

Republicans had the White House, House, and Senate. They had the power to do something and accomplished relatively little.

They went after Democrats over corruption and managed to expose just how much bullshit exists on both sides.

And now we're electing more bad candidates, including some with questionable DSA ideas, because apparently bad and less bad are still our best options.

RED won two years ago because people were fed up with BLUE choosing themselves first and us last. Now the same thing happened in reverse. BLUE still hasn't made a good argument other than "Trump bad." RED has a problem thinking for itself instead of blindly following the leader because he can talk big.

The people did their duty and audited the government. The government lost. On a brighter note, I don't hate the idea of this power dynamic. Checks and balances exist for a reason. RED failed to meet its quota.

The funny thing is, I don't see a whole lot of RED leadership trying to make sense of it. What I'm seeing is, "We sucked at our job, we knew it, and we're not at all surprised by this." Meanwhile, RED voters are trying to figure out how and why.

Next comes two years of investigations, retaliation, and political theater while little actually gets fixed.

Maybe it's a wake-up call. Or maybe it's business as usual with better AI tools.
